NATURE NOTE

Crawdads

While coastal lobsters are famous all over, their down-sized relative, the crawdad, lives in obscurity right here in Midwestern waters. Crawdads are Missouri's largest crustaceans, easily recognized by their beady eyes, long antennae, and those large pinchers that sometimes pack a powerful pinch. Crawdads, or crayfish, can live for up to six years.

Crawdads are not fussy eaters, consuming decayed plants and dead fish. Many animals depend on crayfish for food - from raccoons, mink and otters to many species of fish and wading birds.

If you've ever tried to catch crayfish, you know their defense techniques. Either they make a rapid retreat or they use their pinchers. To move quickly a crayfish swims backward, flipping its tail up and down.

What name do you call these creatures by? Crawdads or crayfish?

Excerpt from the MO Department of Conservation.
